A LOST DAY.

Edgar Fawcett Writes a Possible Case for the Journal.

A Curious Occurrence That Might Have Happened at a New York Club-A Complication in a Love Affair.

"My family," John Dalrymple would say, | "have the strange failing (that is, nearly all of them except myself, on the paternal

And then somebody would always try to Interrupt him. At the Gramercy, the small but charming club of which he had been for years an honored member, they made a point of interrupting him when he began on his family failing. Not a few of them held to the belief that it was a myth of Dalrymple's imagination. Still others argued all of the clan except John himself had been a queer lot; there was no real certainty that they had not done extraordinary acts. Meanwhile, apart from his desire to delve among ancestral records and repeat tales which had been told many times before, he was a genuine favorite with his friends. But that series of family anecdotes remained a standing joke.

They all pitied him when it became known that his engagement to the pretty, winsome widow, Mrs. Carrington, was definitely broken. He was past forty now, and had not been known to pay serious court to any woman before in at least ten years. Of course, Mrs. Carrington was rich. But then her money could not have attracted Dalrymple, for he was rich himself, in spite of his plain way of living there in that small Twenty-second - street basement-years ago, when this little occurrence which we are chronicling took place, it was not so easy as it is now to make sure of a fereigner's credentials and antecedents.

The Count De Pommereul, a reputed French nobleman of high position, had managed to get into the Gramercy as a six months' member, and had managed, also, to cross the thresholds of numerous select New York drawing-rooms. At the very period of his introduction to Mrs. Carrington her engagement with Dalrymple had already become publicly announced. Then in a few weeks society received a shock. Dalrymple was thrown over, and it transpired that the brilliant young widow was betrothed to the Count. Dalrymple, calm and self-centained, had nothing to say on the subject of why he had body ventured to interrogate him. Some people believed in the Count; others thought that there was a ring of faisity about him, that there was a ring of faisity about him, for all his frame was so elegantly slender and supple, for all his mustache was so glossily dark and his eyes so richly lustrous. Dalrymple meanwhile hid his wound, met the Count constantly at the club, though no longer even exchanging bows with him, and—worked at his revenge in secret as a beaver works at the building of his winter ranch. He succeeded, too, in setting superb materials for that revenge getting superb materials for that revenge. They surprised even himself when a few relatives and friends in Paris mailed him appalling documentary evidence as to what sort of a character this Count really was. There is no doubt that he now held in his hand a thunderbolt, and had only to hurl it

He did not tell a single soul what he had learned. The thought of just how he should act haunted him for several days. One vening he went home from the club a litle earlier than usual, and tossed restlessly for a good while after going to bed. When leep came it found him still irresolute as o what course he should take. It seemed to him that he had now a succession of dreams, but he could recall none of them on awaking. And he awoke in a culiar way. There was yet no hint of dawn in the room, and only the light from his gas, turned down to a very dim star. He was sitting boit upright in bed, and feverish, fatigued sensations oppressed him. "What have I been dreaming?" he asked himself, again and again. But as only a confused jumble of memories answered him, he sank back upon the pillows, and was soon buried in slumber.

It was past 9 o'clock in the morning when he next awoke. He felt decidedly better: both the feverishness and the fatigue had left him. He went to the club and breakasted there. It was almost empty of members, as small clubs are apt to be at that our of the morning. But in the ball he met his old friend, Langworth, and bowed to him. Langworth, who was rather neareighted, gave a sudden start and a stare. "How odd," thought Dalrymple, as he passed on into the reading-room; "I hope there's nothing unexpected about my per-sonal appearance." Just at the doorof the room he met another old friend, Summerson, a man ex-tremely strict about all matters of clainly made believe that he had not seen. As they moved by one another, Dalrymple said lightly, "Good morning, old chap, How's your gout?"

Summerson, who was very tall and excessively dignified, gave a comic squirm. Then his eye-lids fluttered, and, with the tips of his lips, he murmured, "Better," as he glided along.

"Pooh!" said Dalrymple to himself, "getting touchy, I suppose, in his old age. How longevity disagrees with some of us mor

He nearly always took a bottle of seltzer before breakfast, and this morning old Andrew (a servant who had been in the club many years) poured it out for him "I hope you are all right again this mornin', sorr." said Andrew, with his Celtic ac-

"All right, Andrew?" was the reply. "Why, you must be thinking of some one else. I haven't been ill. My health has been excellent for some time past."
"Yes, sorr," said Andrew, lowering his eyes and respectfully retiring. That last "Yes, sorr" had a dubious note about its delivery that almost made Dal-rymple call the faithful old fellow back and further question him. "All right again?"

As if he had ever been all wrong—. Oh, well, poor Andrew was aging; others had remarked that fact months ago. A different servant came to announce

A different servant came to announce breakfast. There were only about five men in the dining-room as Dalrymple entered it. All of them gazed at him in an unusual way—or had late events led him to think that they did sof At the table nearest him sat Everdell, one of the jolliest men in the club, a person whose face was nearly always wreathed in smiles.

"Good morning," said Dalrymple, as he canght Everdell's ave.

"Yes, my family have had the strange with mild consternation, and the look that went with them was smileless to a degree of actual gloom. Then Everdell, who has But he said no more. The tension was just finished his breakfast, rose and drew near to Dalrymple.

"'Pon my word." he said, "'I'm delighted

"Pon my word," he said, "I'm delighted to see you all right again, so soon."

"All right again, so soon," was the reply.

"What, in mercy's name, do you mean?"

"Oh, my dear old fellow," began Everdell, fumbling with his watch-chain, "it was pretty bad, you know, yesterday."

"Pretty—bad—yesterday?"

"I saw you in the morning, and for an hour or so in the afterneon. Perhaps no one would have noticed it if you hadn't staid here all day and poured those confidences into people's ears about De Pommereul. You didn't appear to have drank a drop at the club; there's the funny part of it. You went out several times, though, and came back again. All that you had to drink (except some wine here at dinner, you remember) you must have got dinner, you remember) you must have got outside. I wasn't here at 10 o'clock when De Pommereul came in. I'm glad I wasn't. You must have been dreadful. If Summer-son and Joyce hadn't rushed in between you and the Count, heaven knows what would have happened. As it is—"

At this point Dalrymple broke in with cold harshness: "Look here, Everdell, I always disliked practical jokes, and I've known for a number of years that you're given to them. You've never attempted to make me your butt before, however, and you'll have the kindness to discontinue any Everdell drew back for a moment, frowned, shrugged his shoulders, and then, muttering. "Oh, if you're going to put it that way!" strode quickly out of the dining-

One, which he opened first, was marked, "immediate," and had her several letters. ate," and had been sent him from his own house by an intelligent and devoted woman servant there, who had been for a long period in his employ. This letter made poor Dalrympie's head swim as he read it. Written and signed by Mr. Summerson himself, as chairman of the house committee of the club, it ordered him to appear that same evening before a meeting of the governors and answer to a charge of disorderly conduct on the previous night.

Then it went on to state that he, Dalrymple, had been seen throughout the previous day at the club in a state of evident intoxication, and had finally, between the hours of 10 and 11 o'clock P. M., accosted and grossly insulted the Count De Pommercul in the main drawing-room of the "Disorderly conduct," "Evident intoxication," "Grossly insulted the Count De Pommereul"—these words were trembling on Dalrymple's lips as he presently approached Summerson himself, the very gentleman who had signed the letter, and who stood in the hall arrayed for the street.

"What—what does it all mean?" gasped
Dalrymple. "I—I never was intoxicated in my life, Lawrence Summerson; you ought to know that! I played euchre last night up in the card-room, from 9 o'clock till 12, with Ogden, and Folsom, and yourself. If there's any practical joke being got up against me for God's sake—"

"Wait a minute, please," said Summer-son. He went back into the coat-room, disarrayed himself of his street wraps, and finally joined Dalrymple. His first words, low and grave, ran thus: "Can it be possible you don't recollect that our game of euchre was played the night before last, and not last night?" Then he went with Dalrymple into a corner of the readingroom, and they talked together for a good

Dalrymple went back to his home, that day, in a mental whirl. It still wanted a number of hours before the governing committee would meet. He had lost a day out of his life—there could be no doubt of that. If he had moved about the club all of yesterday with a drunken manner, rewiling De Pommereul to everybody who would lend him an ear-if he had afterward met De Pommereul in the club, and directed toward him, in loud and furious tones, a perfect torrent of accusation—he himself was completely, blankly ignorant.

For a good while he sat quite still and thought. Then he summoned Ann, the elderly and very trustworthy Ann, who had been his dear mother's maid, and was now his housekeeper. He questioned Ann, and after dismissing her he pondered her answers. Three times yesterday she had seen him, and regarding his appearance Ann had her distinct opinions.

Suddenly a light flashed upon Dalrymple while he sat alone and brooded. He sprang up, and a cry, half of awe, half of gladness, left his lips. The baffling problem had been solved.

That evening he presented himself before the governing committee. All assembled were sorry for him. Of course, punishment must be dealt, but for an old and popular member like Dalrymple it must not be expulsion. The general feeling of the club had, indeed, already been gauged, and it was in favor of suspension for six months. or a year at the furthest.

Dalrymple, however, was determined that he should be visited with no punishment at all. And he meant to state why. His judges, as he faced them, all looked politely grim. The president, after a few suave preliminaries, asked Dalrymple if he had anything to say concerning the charges preferred against him. Dalrymple then proceeded to speak, with a clear voice and composed demeanor.

His first sentence electrified his hearers. "I have no possible recollection of yesterday," he began, "and it is precisely as much of a lost day to me as though I had lain chloroformed for twenty-tour hours. On Wednesday night I returned home from this club and went to rest. I never really woke until Friday, possibly a little while after midnight, and then within my own bed. On Thursday morning I must have risen in a state of somnambulism, hypnotism, mental aberration, whatever you please, and not come to myself until Thursday had passed and I had once more retired. Of what yesterday occurred I therefore claim to have been the irresponsible agent and to have become so through no fault of my own. I am completely innocent of the misdemeanors charged against me, and I now solemnly swear this on my word of honor as a gentleman."

Here Dalrymple paused. The members of the committee interchanged glances, amid profound silence. On some faces doubt could be read, but on others its veriest opposite. The intense stillness had become painful when Dalrymple spoke

"I had hoped that I should escape throughout my own lifetime all visitations of this distressing kind. My grandfather and two of my uncles not only walked in their sleep to an alarming degree, but were each subject to strange conditions of mind in which acts were performed by them that they could not possibly remember afterward."

Here the speaker paused, soon continuing, however, in a lower and more reflect-loosened, and a great roar of laughter rose from the whole committee. How often every man there had joked him about that marvelous budget of stories which he infallibly began one way, and one way only. And when the familiar formula sounded forth it was all the funnier to those who heard it because of the solemn, judicial circumstances in which it again met their hearing.

The plaintiff was honorably acquitted.

As for De Pommereul, as every word that Dalrymple had said concerning his past life in France happened to be perfectly true, the Count never reappeared at the Gramercy. His engagement with Mrs. Carrington was soon afterward broken off by the lady herself, and for a good while it was rumored that this lady had repentantly made it optional with Dalrymple whether he should once more become her accepted aweetheart.

But Dalrymple remained a bachelor. He is quite an old man now, yet he still may be found in the card-room of the Gramercy nearly every evening. He is very willing to tell you the story of his "lost day" if you ask him courteously for it, and not in any strain of fun-poking; but he attempts no more voluntary recitals on the subject of his "family's" maladies or mishaps.
